My Presbyterian father

by Duncan D. Newcomer in the May 4, 2004 issue

He would sit Sunday mornings in his big steepled chair the cross hung gold and unswayed overhead a man in a robe. I had seen him dress sitting on the side of his bed he wore ribbed gauzy undershirts and white boxer shorts and my father's legs had no hair where socks go. As the organist played a meditation he would span his forehead with his hand and seem to suffer but then leaning back his bright eyes would go fishing for me in the dark congregation and I waited and waited until he caught me and smiled.

During most of the service
I stared at unmoving biblical men in stained glass.
I loved to have him
see me in church
and after the sermon
I stood in line
and went through shaking his hand

like we didn't know each other and I told him I enjoyed it and he put his other hand on top of mine.
