Hummers

by J. Barrie Shepherd in the June 29, 2004 issue

Even in Maine's rain and fog I catch them, often in pairs, or waiting, patient, perched on a scarcely bending twig of our aged forsythia, then working the window box petunias till the coast seems clear, while I hover, motionless, on the shadowed porch, hungry for still another glimpse of ruby throat and emerald layered coat, the delicate dip of beak in cup, the tilted head, the blur of wings, that sudden flash of movement now-you-see-me-now-you-don't. Whatever it may be in me some wandered/wondered child that makes me watch and wait, this late, the daily hours to catch their, almost holy, visitations, I'm grateful for it, mindful too of one who, every once in a long while, still hovers back there just beyond, behind the nearest edge of solitude, or prayer, or even glimpses of the tiniest of birds.
