Ave Maria

by Penelope Duckworth in the December 12, 2006 issue

Why does the angel always hold out a lily?
Is it because she is a lily of a lady;
As lithe and surprising, as pearlescent?
Or because the starring petals trumpet good news?

Or was she essentially being asked to consider the lilies; pulling sidereal considerations down to the lilies of the field?

And these lilies with magenta freckles, spring-green ribbed where the petals fold, looking like blood and passion with their fragrance of spice and memory.

Isn't looking into their center to glimpse glory; to spiral to heaven, dew-eyed, dusted and trailing copper pollen? Is there any other word but yes?
