Anatomy of seduction

by Mary M. Brown in the April 22, 2008 issue it turns out the allure of hummingbirds has little to do with their own rouge instead, the thrilling iridescence of their wings depends upon the distance between the ridges of their feathers, dulling structures my guess we'd ignore, were it not for some blessed interplay with incident light