Advent

by Todd Outcalt in the December 14, 2010 issue

The leaves have at last slipped from the trees And capped the snail trails along the concrete steps, With winter tasks completed, windows caulked Beside the smooth inebriations of chimney smoke.

We feel a portent wafting on cold breeze: An omen marked by frost upon the panes. The wind snatches the notes that we once spoke, And in the silence children huddle like refrains.

The fires are stoked, the quilts folded with ease Around the margins like an envelope, And every hearth that opens its mouth to sing Emits a fear not greater than its hope.
