Birdbath

by Jeanne Murray Walker in the October 18, 2011 issue

The tiny whitecaps bare their rotten teeth all morning as wind berates rainwater, as razors of rain gash its surface and then the thunder takes back its threats and the water in the birdbath lies smooth enough to skate on, lies like a mirror holding up a silver airplane while it crosses the sky safely, all its people drinking from their plastic cups.