New today (and yesterday) from the Century:

- John Buchanan on the March on Washington: "I wanted to join a group of pastors going to the March on Washington. But I had young children and no money for bus fare and meals, so I didn't. I've rued it ever since." (subscription required)
- From the archives, the Century's coverage of the march: "Integrate the integration march!' said the headline. The editors joined the NCC and others in calling for '40,000 white churchmen' to participate in the March on Washington."
- James Calvin Schaap on the forgiveness white Christians need: "People said my father was a saint. But I remember what he thought about Martin Luther King."
- Amy Frykholm talks to Scott Korb about Zaytuna College: "The school believes that there is no way for Islam to grow in this country unless Muslims build institutions that approach the culture with openness."
- Gary Anderson on almsgiving in scripture: "In the Bible, forgiveness involves repayment of what is owed. One way to pay down the debt is through charity to the poor." (subscription required)
- Gail Irwin on the need to put the past on a shelf
- Steve Thorngate on churches and tax-exempt status
- Shauna Hannan's lectionary column for Sunday, September 8 (subscription required)

• "Wilderness," a poem by Sarah Klassen
