

Excavating the Sky, by Konstantin Kulakov

Books in the November 25, 2015 issue

In Review

Excavating the Sky

By Konstantin Kulakov

Dialogue Foundation Books

Kulakov's poems find the holy in the unsettling yoke of disparities: in the Bible and Qur'an lying side by side; in a mango glowing from within an aluminum can; in Harlem, where "flowers of blood nailed Christ to the walls." These are poems of displacement, as the poet wanders from D.C. to Moscow to Pakistan to Oxford to Georgia and beyond. In South Carolina he learns “life is a mute, gentle oppression / lined with rails near the edges of peril.” These perilous edges permeate his landscapes and define his journey as they do for anyone exiled from Eden. These are brave, bold poems, excruciatingly beautiful as they lay bare our predicament and direct our gaze toward what he labels “Reality.” Kulakov’s is a voice to be reckoned with, in his prophetic stance, in the power of his language, and in his linkage of poetry with the life of faith.