

Can a corporation exercise religion?

According to the Trump administration, even a company owned by millions of unrelated people can be a person of faith.

From the Editors in the November 8, 2017 issue

Attorney General Jeff Sessions. Some rights reserved by Gage Skidmore.

In recent years, religious exercise claims by Christians have clashed repeatedly with other rights claims, such as for equal treatment under the law. The Trump administration has made its sympathies clear: it will put its thumb down heavily on the religious freedom side of the scale. In October, Attorney General Jeff Sessions released a memo spelling this policy out in sweeping detail.

Some critics of this move have focused on Sessions's assertion that the government cannot "second-guess the reasonableness of a religious belief." But this is one place where Sessions is, at face value anyway, correct. The U.S. government has been rightly reticent to determine which beliefs are worth protecting. The more alarming development concerns not the beliefs but the alleged believer: Who gets to claim such protection? "Government shall not substantially burden a person's exercise of religion," states the Religious Freedom Restoration Act of 1993. But what counts as a person?

Now any employer can avoid providing birth control—and perhaps avoid other rules as well.

That question was addressed in 2014 when the Supreme Court ruled that Hobby Lobby and other closely held corporations are eligible under RFRA for exemptions from Obamacare's contraception mandate. Writing for the majority, Justice Samuel Alito acknowledged that corporate personhood is just a legal construct but argued that protecting a corporation's free exercise amounts to protecting the exercise of the actual persons who own it. As for whether that rule also applies to publicly traded corporations with more diffuse ownership, Alito maintained that the question of their religious exercise was not on the table at that time.

It's on the table now. The Trump administration also published new regulations allowing any employer to seek a religious exemption to the contraception mandate. If Hobby Lobby's claim of religious exercise reflected the beliefs of the family with a controlling interest, now such a claim might be made on behalf of a company owned by millions of otherwise unrelated people, some of whom don't even know what stocks they own. They have free exercise rights, so apparently the company does, too.

This rule came out the same day as the Sessions memo articulating broad deference to such claims. The juxtaposition suggests where we're headed: if a company wants an exemption from a given law, a promising strategy will be to phrase the request in the form of a religious exercise claim. It "seems unlikely," wrote Alito, that a large, publicly traded company would assert such a claim. Of course, a lot of things seemed unlikely in 2014. In 2017, the executive branch appears determined to grease the wheels for just that.

Perhaps a corporation will invoke religion so as to save money by avoiding some provision of the law. Maybe it will assert a market-tested belief in a play for religious customers. While private or closely held companies might choose to make the profit motive subservient to religious ideals, a publicly traded corporation's structure all but rules this out. Such companies do indeed embody certain values—they just don't have much to do with religious exercise.

A version of this article appears in the November 8 print edition under the title "Can a corporation exercise religion?"