Epiphany

by Marjorie Maddox in the February 24, 2021 issue

January 6, 2021

And so they rush the steps and bash the doors. With windows smashed, the winter light breaks in. Forgotten is the frankincense, the myrrh, the gold the wise men brought. Instead, our kin or neighbors storm the halls. We recognize their faces, tense with hate. In different form they look a bit like us. Yet we surmise this mob that waves its flags, together swarms toward House or Senate, cannot live so near. We say hello on walks? They guard our homes? This is the hard epiphany we fear: the ones we loathe and love might be the same.

And that bright star? We find the manger bare except for all our anger swaddled there.