Be Still and Know: Morning Fishing

by Marjorie Maddox in the May 2023 issue —after the painting Fishing by Jean Carruthers Wetta

In the blue-gray early mornings, when boy and man say nothing, hear all—water, fish, wind, wave prayer weaves through air, a silent Amen breaking the surface of ripple, enough to claim a large-mouthed bass or an undulating lake of faith in the blue-gray early morning. When boy and man rise and ready—their rods soon casting the unspoken across arch of sky—together they brave cold and fog, crave prayer woven through air. Church-silent, their Amens lap against boat, echo the language of fishermen off Galilee's shores, how, even in storms, they share this catch of blue-gray early mornings. Boys become men in such weather; patience becomes praise. This is what men teach boys while reeling day in—what to discard, to save. This is how prayer, silent, weaves through air, Amens arriving through motion or sun. The week the world began, someone was fishing—water, fish, wind, wave. It was God in those blue-gray mornings, then woman and man. Eden's prayers wove through air: early, grateful Amens.