It is impossible that the son of these tears should perish.

—St. Monica, mother of Augustine of Hippo

I use the wide knife blade as he taught me to crush the garlic clove and toss it in with vegetables and olive oil letting my hands feel their skins and shapes and slickness, the same hands that bathed and oiled him when he was too small to stand, as I bathe him now with tears in his fall an ocean away and can't command them, running stupidly into my bowl of squash and onions, for tears are not of this world, nor do they heed a mother's will to set things right, like setting the table or making a grocery list, or saying, "Don't look back."

The past cruelly presses on us all, but just now, at my granite counter, let me savor the pungence of one crushed clove.
