

Mourning Dove

by Paul Willis in the February 2024 issue

Published on February 7, 2024

Five days after my father died, I passed a brown mourning dove perched atop a grade-school fence.

As I ran by, scarcely a foot away from its tail, it did not move, it did not flutter. Minutes later,

I returned on that same path, and the mourning dove was still there.
This time, I put my eye up to its eye, black and blank, and I'd like to think we saw each other through those windows of the soul.

Was it sick, stunned, dying, or—improbably—already gone but as yet unfallen, balanced between this life and the next, its body arranged for one last private viewing?

Already that week, I had seen what I never wished to see again.
So here is what I want to say:

Fly, gentle dove, and leave your mourning.
We don't pretend to know your story;
rest in peace and rise in glory.