

Minimum

by Cara Bertron in the August 7, 2013 issue

My brother makes lists of what he needs to live.
He is down to a towel, a small rucksack, good socks, rice and beans and clementines, and flip-flops for strange showers. He wants to be a saint and the holiest travel light. Easier to press close to God wearing only a thin shirt and holding a short list of other loves. He worries, sharp-nosed and sweet, how much to treasure a sturdy hat or a stack of warm tortillas; he digs his fingers into the rocky, well-loved home soil. He'll have to shake it off, so's not to be weighed down on his way to heaven.
In this late night during a visit home, our parents snore tenderly in a distant room. We do not speak of loving God more than one's family, though we both know the rules; we do not speak of knees scarred by prayer.
Loss and revelation both come in whispers: we do not speak.