Girl Reading a Letter at an Open Window
Vermeer (c. 1657-59)

Wanting to know what she knows, he enters the painting. She stands so still, so long, reading a letter by borrowed light. It seems she will read it forever.

 He hesitates,
the reflection of her hair gilding the window brings to mind the virgin; that and the angle of her head above the paper, like the tilt of lilies in conventional annunciations.

The air is pleasing, cool—the curved lap of snow on the ledge, an amnesty of white.

 He takes his infinite time. He wants her to overshadow him, overwhelm him. He wants to carry anything she might offer for as long as it might take him to deliver.
