

Ancestors

by Lisa Dordal in the July 2023 issue

My parents are ghosts now, ancestors who enter my dreams, sit with me in a circle during morning meditation. We talk about small things—the keys my mother dropped in the snow on her walk home from work. The chili she'd made as an antidote to the cold.

I tell them I'm studying mysticism. I tell them stories about St. Theresa—how, as a child, she began to walk in circles when she first heard the word forever, repeating it over and over—forever becoming flesh, flesh becoming word.

I tell them we've finished dividing their belongings and that I've hung the seagull painting in our living room—how, as a child, I'd always thought the boulder to the right of the seagull was the long, sad face of a basset hound, while the boulder to the left was Jesus—how he must have appeared in my book of Sunday lessons—delicately sketched with room for the imagination. Of course, they're still there—Jesus and the dog.

I can't un-see them. Though the sun, in the painting—more like the moon on a cloudy day—is easy to miss.
