—after Kapouzos [ΝΙΚΟΣ ΚΑΠΟΥΖΟΣ]

Yes, sweet, and very sweet the darkness of the nave, and also very sweet the observant surround, these icons of our ancient fathers and our mothers, whose images have acquired a warm chiaroscuro from centuries of fragrant smoke—incense, beeswax wafting for centuries attended by seamless petition and praise. Such prayers as these yet fill the air with yet another palpable sweetness.

So often, the world appears wretched, choked by a broken, angry and willfully cruel people. So often, the world proves wretched indeed, and its darkness is bitter. How then to mitigate the assault waiting just beyond the narthex? How to carry at least some distance into the world this fragrance, this sweetness, these images?
