Ants

by Laurie Klein in the July 2024 issue Published on June 10, 2024

Come hither, for sugar . . .

Countless antennae sweep the phantom scent trail left behind like a runic text, by the vigilant scout in the lead. O pheromones! O antsy, listening feet, swarming the green pantries of summer, each fattening bud candied with nectar. Fabled ticklers, do you really unpick those sealed lips, coaxing that first blush a peony's silk? No. Although

I want to read your frantic vocation this way, equate my own nipping and thinning a similar instinct, all for the garden's survival. I imagine your secret anthem: Come hither, for sugar . . . Vamoose, aphid and thrip, scar and wilt! Let us be antiphons of collected sweetness, borne home, to the others. And if an ant's amen is a full sac, or a mantra to store and to swallow, like truth—well, it seems small glories need no one, to bloom.