Suddenly the House Went Dark

by Jeanne Murray Walker in the November 2024 issue Published on November 1, 2024

And though we flipped all the switches, tested breakers in the basement, phoned and phoned, Nothing. When the big boys turn off your power, it's gone. Our house dark then, as the inside of a shut refrigerator. Our red walls purpling until they seemed to emit cries like a ringing telephone.

Now we stumble around the house in the frigid black, feeling our way from room to room, marveling that we recognize so little. No keyboard works except the piano. But music? —is over and done with.

I rummage for paper and pencil, thinking I will scribble this poem the old way, trying to remember how. Around me, rooms from my past houses switch places with one another. I meet my old self walking down the hall. Our yard has blinked out, gone now from all our windows. What if the whole city goes black? What if dark extinguishes the sun? What if God pulls some big plug for good? What will we believe in? In what dark house will we live?