

Passion fans feel snubbed by Hollywood: Academy Award omission

Conservative Christian groups are outraged but not surprised, they say, that last year's box-office hit The Passion of the Christ didn't get an Academy Award nomination for best picture or best director.

Mel Gibson's film, which grossed $370 million in the U.S. and more than $600 million worldwide, did receive three nominations—for makeup, original score and cinematography.

But some religious fans still see the omission as a snub, said Catholic League president William Donohue. "There's no question that bigotry and prejudice is rank among the liberal elite of Hollywood," said Louis Sheldon, founder of the Washington-based Traditional Values Coalition. Tim Wildmon, president of the Tupelo, Mississippi-based American Family Association, said he would have been surprised if The Passion received a best picture nomination from what he called the "anti-Christian" Hollywood community.

Gibson's bloody depiction of the last days of Christ's life is the ninth-highest-grossing movie of all time in the U.S. Some Jewish leaders say it is anti-Semitic in the way it stereotypically portrays Jews and blames them for Christ's death, but the film was extremely popular.
